Contents

List of Figures 13

List of Tables 15

1. Introduction 17

1.1. Research context, research questions, and main findings 18
1.2. The relevance of citizens' EU attitudes 22
1.3. Research design and selection of societies 27
1.4. Further outline of the study 28

2. Examining citizens' EU attitudes: the state of the art 31

2.1. The concept of attitudes: definition, structure, and formation processes 31
2.2. Typologies of citizens' EU attitudes 34
2.3. Determinants of citizens' EU attitudes: theoretical approaches and empirical results 40
2.3.1. Economic models 40
2.3.2. Collective identities 42
2.3.3. Political cues 43
2.3.4. Citizens' EU attitudes in post-communist societies 45
2.3.5. Empirical results 48
2.4. Discussion: citizens' EU support, the role of public debates, and "framing" 51

3. Citizens' EU attitudes and the sociological framing approach 57

3.1. Social constructionism and what people "know" 57
3.2. The role of communication and public discourses 60
3.3. Frames and framing 65
3.4. Consequences and determinants of framing 72
3.5. Discussion and heuristic hypotheses 76

4. Research Design 79

4.1. "Where is the frame?" Operationalizing interpretative structures 79
4.2. Examining public EU frames in (Eastern) Germany and Poland 82
4.3. Examining cognitive EU frames: the process of data collection 83
4.3.1. Constructing the interview schedule 84
4.3.2. Sampling 87
4.3.3. Conducting and transcribing the interviews 90
4.4. Primary analysis of cognitive frames: qualitative content analysis 92
4.4.1. The inductive coding process 93
4.4.2. The deductive coding process: linking public and cognitive frames 94
4.5. Secondary analysis of cognitive frames: frequencies, classifications, and Qualitative Comparative Analysis (QCA) 96
4.6. Discussion: the empirical analysis of public and cognitive EU frames 102

5. Public frames of European integration in (Eastern) Germany 105

5.1. Historical roots 105
5.2. The GDR and "Europe" 111
5.3. The FRG and "Europe" 114
5.4. Germany and "Europe" after 1989 121
5.5. Discussion: German public EU frames, their objects and attitudes 127

6. Public frames of European integration in Poland 133

6.1. Historical roots 133
6.2. The Polish People's Republic and "Europe" 136
6.3. Poland and "Europe" after 1989 140
6.4. Discussion: Polish public EU frames, their objects and attitudes 148
6.5. Public frames in (Eastern) Germany and Poland: a comparison 152

7. "What do you think about the EU?" Citizens' shared EU frames in Eastern Germany and Poland 159

7.1. Talking about the EU: some general remarks 159
7.2. Dominant cognitive EU frames 161
7.2.1. "A Solidary Community" 161
7.2.2. "A People's Europe" 164
7.2.3. "A Beneficial Single Market" 166
7.2.4. "National Discrimination" 167

7.3. Cognitive EU frames of moderate relevance 170
7.3.1. "A Disastrous Single Market" 170
7.3.2. "A Positive Lifeworld" 172
7.3.3. "A Threat to National Identity and Sovereignty" 173
7.4. Cognitive EU frames of minor relevance 174
7.5. Discussion: citizens' shared EU frames in a wider context 176
7.5.1. The linkage between public and cognitive EU frames 176
7.5.2. The linkage to previous research 180

8. National cognitive frames: the EU in Eastern Germany and Poland 185

8.1. The Eastern German EU: main perceptions 185
8.1.1. "A Bad Political System" 185
8.1.2. "A Global Player" 189
8.1.3. "Threats of Enlargement" 191
8.2. The Eastern German EU: further perceptions 192
8.2.1. "An Inherent Necessity" 192
8.2.2. "A Legacy of World War II" 194
8.2.3. "Disappointment" 195
8.3. Cognitive EU frames, their objects and attitudes in Eastern Germany 196
8.4. The Polish EU: main perceptions 204
8.4.1. "Modernization" 204
8.4.2. "Protection and Power" 207
8.5. The Polish EU: further perceptions 208
8.5.1. "A European Identity" 208
8.5.2. "A Successful Transformation" 209
8.6. Cognitive EU frames, their objects and attitudes in Poland 211
8.7. Discussion: ways of framing the EU across national contexts 216
8.7.1. Cognitive frames and their linkage to public frames, EU objects, and EU attitudes 217
8.7.2. The linkage to previous research 219

9. The linkage between framing, EU attitudes, and integration models 223

9.1. How Eastern Germans and Poles evaluate the EU 223
9.2. Cognitive frames and EU attitudes: comparing "supporters" and "critics" 225
9.2.1. The EU framing of "committed supporters" 227
9.2.2. The EU framing of "critics" 229
9.3. EU framing and types of EU attitudes across national subgroups 231
9.4. The participants' favored integration models 233
9.5. The EU's future development and participants' cognitive EU frames 237

9.5.1. The transfer of legislative power 237
9.5.2. The EU's social responsibility 239
9.5.3. The EU's enlargement and Turkey's accession 240
9.6. Discussion: cognitive frames, EU attitudes, and integration models 244

10. Beyond nationality: additional determinants of citizens' EU framing 249

10.1. Sociodemographic and regional differences 249
10.2. The role of interest, collective identities, and the transformation process 252
10.3. Framing the EU: a configurational analysis of its conditions 256
10.3.1. Selection of cases and conditions 257
10.3.2. Conducting multi-value QCA 260
10.3.3. Summary of results 261
10.4. Discussion: EU framing across societies and social groups 272
10.4.1. The relevance of social milieu 272
10.4.2. Cognitive EU frames of different social groups and their EU attitudes 276

11. Conclusion and outlook 279

11.1. Public and cognitive EU frames 279
11.1.1. Public EU constructions across national contexts 279
11.1.2. How citizens frame the EU: national and social variation 280
11.2. The linkage between cognitive EU frames, EU attitudes, and integration models 283
11.3. Post-communist features of public and cognitive EU frames 286
11.4. Contributions, limitations, and outlook 287
11.4.1. Qualitative research 287
11.4.2. Quantitative research 289
11.4.3. Frames and Values 292

Appendix 295

References 305